

Chapter 1

Josh and I hated our new house. Sure, it was big. It looked like a mansion compared to our old house. It was a tall redbrick house with a sloping black roof and rows of windows framed by black shutters. Its so dark, I thought, studying it from the street. The whole house was covered in darkness, as if it were hiding in the shadows of the gnarled, old trees that bent over it. It was the middle of July, but dead brown leaves blanketed the front yard. Our sneakers crunched over them as we nudged up the gravel driveway. Tall weeds poked up everywhere through the dead leaves. Thick clumps of weeds had completely overgrown an old flower bed beside the front porch. This house is creepy, I thought unhappily. Josh must have been thinking the same thing. Looking up at the old house, we both growled loudly. Mr. Dawes, the friendly young man from the local real estate office, stopped near the front walk and turned around. Everything okay? he asked, staring first at Josh, then at me, with his crinkly blue eyes. Josh and Amanda aren't happy about moving, Dad explained, tucking his shirttail in. Dad is a little overweight, and his shirts always seem to be coming untucked. Its hard for kids, my mother added, smiling at Mr. Dawes, her hands shoved into her jeans pockets as she continued up to the front door. You know. Leaving all of their friends behind. Moving to a strange new place. Strange is right, Josh said, shaking his head. This house is gross, Mr. Dawes chuckled. Its an old house, thats for sure, he said, patting Josh on the shoulder. It just needs some work, Josh. Dad said, smiling at Mr. Dawes. No one has lived in it for a while, so I'll take some fixing up. Look how big it is. Mom added, smoothing back her straight black hair and smiling at Josh. Well have room for a dog and maybe a tree, too. You'd like that, wouldn't you, Amanda? I shrugged. A cold breeze made me shiver. It was actually a beautiful, hot summer day. But the closer we got to the house, the colder I felt. I guessed it was because of all the tall, old trees. I was wearing white tennis shorts and a sleeveless blue T-shirt. It had been hot in the car. But now I was freezing. Maybe its the summer in the house, I thought. How old are they? Mr. Dawes asked Mom, stepping onto the front porch. Amanda is twelve. Mom answered. And Josh turned eleven last month. They look so much alike, Mr. Dawes told Mom. I couldn't decide if that was a compliment or not. I guess its true. Josh and I are both tall and thin and have curly brown hair like Dad, and dark brown eyes. Everyone says we have serious faces. I really want to go home, Josh said, his voice cracking. I hate this place. My brother is the most important kid in the world. And when he makes up his mind about something, thats it. Hes a little spoiled. At least, I think so. Whenever he makes a big fuss about something, he usually gets his way. We may look alike, but were really not that similar. Im a lot more patient than Josh is. A lot more sensible. Probably because Im older and because Im a girl. Josh had held of Dads hand and was trying to pull him back to the car. Lets go. Come on, Dad. Lets go. I knew this was one time Josh wouldn't get his way. We were moving to this house. No doubt about it. After all, the house was absolutely free. A great excuse of Dads, a man we didnt even know, had died and left the house to Dad in his will. Ill never forget the look on Dads face when he got the letter from the lawyer. He let out a loud whoop and began dancing around the living room. Josh and I thought hed flipped or something. My Great-Uncle Charles has left us a house in his will, Dad explained, reading and rereading the letter. Its in a town called Dark Falls. Hah! Josh and I cried. Where Dark Falls? Dad shrugged. I dont remember your Uncle Charles, Mom said, moving behind Dad to read the letter over his shoulder. Neither do I, admitted Dad. But he mustve been a great guy! Wow! This sounds like an incredible house! He grabbed Moms hands and began dancing happily with her across the living room. Dad sure was excited. Hed been looking for an excuse to quit his boring office job and devote all of his time to his writing career. This house absolutely fitrewood be just the excuse he needed. And now, a week later, here we were in Dark Falls, a four-hour drive from our home, seeing our new house for the first time. We hadnt even gone inside, and Josh was trying to drag Dad back to the car. Josh kept pulling me. Dad snapped impatiently, trying to tug his hand out of Joshs grasp. Dad glanced helplessly at Mr. Dawes. I could see that he was embarrassed by how Josh was carrying on. I decided maybe I could help. Let go, Josh, I said quietly, grabbing Josh by the shoulder. We promised wed give Dark Falls a chance, remember? I already gave it a chance, Josh whined, not letting go of Dads hand. This house is old and ugly and I hate it. You havent even gone inside, Dad said angrily. Yes. Lets go in, Mr. Dawes urged, staring at Josh. Im staying outside, Josh insisted. He can be really stubborn sometimes. I felt just as unhappy as Josh looking at this dark, old house. But Id never carry on the way Josh was. Josh, dont you want to pick out your own room? Mom asked. No, Josh muttered. He and I both glanced up to the second floor. There were two large bay windows side by side up there. They looked like two dark eyes staring back at us. How long have you lived in your present house? Mr. Dawes asked Dad. Dad had to think for a second. About fourteen years, he answered. The kids have lived there for their whole lives. Moving is always hard, Mr. Dawes said sympathetically, turning his gaze on me. You know, Amanda, I moved here to Dark Falls just a few months ago. I didnt like it much either, at first. But now I wouldnt live anywhere else. He winked at me. He had a cute dimple in his chin when he smiled. Lets go inside. Its really quite nice. Youll be surprised. All of us followed Mr. Dawes, except Josh. Are there other kids on this block? Josh demanded. He made it sound more like a challenge than a question. Mr. Dawes nodded. The schools just two blocks away, he said, pointing up the street. See? Mom quickly cut in. A short walk to school. No more long bus rides every morning. I liked the bus, Josh insisted. His mind was made up. He wanted going to give my parents a break, even though wed both promised to be open-minded about this move. I dont know what Josh thought he had to gain by being such a pain. I mean, Dad already had plenty to worry about. For one thing, he hadnt been able to sell our old house yet. I didnt like the idea of moving. But I knew that inheriting this big house was a great opportunity for us. We were so cramped in our little house. And once Dad managed to sell the old place, we wouldnt have to worry at all about money anymore. Josh should at least give it a chance. Thats what I thought. Suddenly, from our car at the foot of the driveway, we heard Petyr barking and howling and making a fuss. Petyr is our dog, a white, curly-tailed terrier, cute as a button, and usually well-behaved. He never minded being left in the car. But now he was yowling and yapping at full volume and scratching at the car window, desperate to get out. Preoccupied? Quiet! I shouted. Petyr usually listened to me. But not this time. Im going to let him out! Josh declared, and took off down the driveway toward the car. No. Wait! Dad called. But I dont think Josh could hear him over Petyrs walk. Might as well let the dog explore, Mr. Dawes said. Its going to be his house, too. A few seconds later, Petyr came charging across the lawn, kicking up brown leaves, yipping excitedly as he ran up to us. He jumped on all of us as if he hadnt seen us in weeks and then, to our surprise, he started growling menacingly and barking at Mr. Dawes. Petyr? Mom yelled. Hes never done this. Dad said apologetically. Really. Hes usually very friendly. He probably smells something on me. Another dog, maybe. Mr. Dawes said, loosening his striped tie, looking warily at our growling dog. Finally, Josh grabbed Petyr around the middle and lifted him away from Mr. Dawes. Stop it, Petyr. Josh scolded, holding the dog up close to his face so that they were nose-to-nose. Mr. Dawes is our friend. Petyr whimpered and licked Joshs face. After a short while, Josh set him back on the ground. Petyr looked up at Mr. Dawes, then at me, then decided to go sniffing around the yard, letting his nose lead the way. Lets go inside, Mr. Dawes urged, moving a hand through his short blond hair. He unlocked the front door and pushed it open. Mr. Dawes held the screen door open for us. I started to follow my parents into the house. Ill stay out here with Petyr, Josh insisted from the walk. Dad started to protest, but changed his mind. Okay. Fine, he said, sighing and shaking his head. Im not going to argue with you. Dont come in. You can live outside if you want. He sounded really exasperated. I want to stay with Petyr, Josh said again, watching Petyr nose his way through the dead flower bed. Mr. Dawes followed us into the hallway, gently closing the screen door behind him, giving Josh a final glance. Hell be fine, he said softly, smiling at Mom. He can be so stubborn sometimes, Mom said apologetically. She peeked into the living room. Im really sorry about Petyr. I dont know what got into that dog. No problem. Lets start in the living room. Mr. Dawes said, leading the way. I think youll be pleasantly surprised by how spacious it is. Of course, it needs work. He took us on a tour of every room in the house. I was beginning to get excited. The house was really kind of neat. There were so many rooms and so many closets. And my room was huge and had its own bathroom and an old-fashioned window seat where I could sit at the window and look down at the street. I wished Josh had come inside with us. If he could see how great the house was inside, I knew hed start to cheer up. I couldnt believe how many rooms there were. Even a finished attic filled with old furniture and stacks of old, mysterious cartons we could explore. We must have been inside for at least half an hour. I didnt really keep track of the time. I think all three of us were feeling cheered up. Well, I think Ive shown you everything, Mr. Dawes said, glancing at his watch. He led the way to the front door. Wait! want to take one more look at my room, I told them excitedly. I started up the stairs, taking them two at a time. Ill be down in a second. Hurry, dear. Im sure Mr. Dawes has other appointments, Mom called after me. I rushed the second-floor landing and hurried down the narrow hallway and into my new room. Wow! I said aloud, and the word echoed faintly against the empty walls. It was so big. And I loved the big window with the window seat. It walked over it and peered out. Through the trees, I could see our car in the driveway and, beyond it, a house that looked a lot like ours across the street. Im going to put my bed against that wall across from the window. I thought happily. And my desk can go over there. Ill have room for a computer now! I took one more look at my closet, a long walk-in closet with a light in the ceiling, and wide shelves against the back wall. I was heading to the door, thinking about which of my posters I wanted to bring with me, when I saw the boy. He stood in the doorway for just a second. And then he turned and disappeared down the hall. Josh? I cried. Heycome look! With a shock, I realized it wasnt Josh. For one thing, the boy had blond hair. Hey! I called and ran to the hallway, stepping just outside my bedroom door, looking both ways. Whos here? But the long hall was empty. All of the doors were closed. When, Amanda, I said aloud. Was I seeing things? Mom and Dad were calling from downstairs. I took one last look down the dark corridor, then hurried to rejoin them. Hey, Mr. Dawes, I called as I ran down the stairs, in this house, haunter? He chuckled. The question seemed to strike him funny. No. Sorry, he said, looking at me with those crinkly blue eyes. No ghost included. A lot of old boxes around here are said to be haunted. But Im afraid this isnt one of them. It thought I saw something, I said, feeling a little foolish. Probably just shadows, Mom said. With all the trees, this house is so dark. Why dont you run outside and tell Josh about the house. Dad suggested, tucking in the front of his shirt. Your Mom and I have some things to talk over with Mr. Dawes. Yes, master, I said with a little bow, and obediently ran out to tell Josh all about what he had missed. Hey, Josh, I called, eagerly searching the yard. Josh? My heart sank. Josh and Petyr were gone.

Chapter 2

Josh! Josh! First I called Josh. Then I called Petey. But there was no sign of either of them. I ran down to the bottom of the driveway and peered into the car, but they weren't there. Mom and Dad were still inside talking with Mr. Dawes. I looked along the street in both directions, but there was no sign of them. Josh! Hey, Josh! Finally, Mom and Dad came hurrying out the front door, looking alarmed. I guess they heard my shouts. I can't find Josh or Petey! I yelled up to them from the street. Maybe they're around back, Dad shouted down to me. I headed up the driveway, kicking away dead leaves as I ran. It was sunny down on the street, but as soon as I entered our yard, I was back in the shade, and it was immediately cool again. Hey, Josh! Josh where are you? Why did I feel so scared? It was perfectly natural for Josh to wander off. He did it all the time. I ran full speed along the side of the house. Tall trees leaned over the house on this side, blocking out nearly all of the sunlight. The backyard was bigger than I'd expected, a long rectangle that sloped gradually down to a wooden fence at the back. Just like the front, this yard was a mass of tall weeds, poking up through a thick covering of brown leaves. A stone birdbath had toppled onto its side. Beyond it, I could see the side of the garage, a dark, brick building that matched the house. Hey Josh! He wasn't back here. I stopped and searched the ground for footprints or a sign that he had run through the thick leaves. Well? Out of breath, Dad came jogging up to me. No sign of him, I said, surprised at how worried I felt. Did you check the car? He sounded more angry than worried. Yes. It's the first place I looked. I gave the backyard a last quick search. I don't believe Josh would just take off. I do, Dad said, rolling his eyes. You know your brother when he doesn't get his way. Maybe he wants us to think he's run away from home. He frowned. Where is he? Mom asked as we returned to the front of the house. Dad and I both shrugged. Maybe he made a friend and wandered off, Dad said. He raised a hand and scratched his curly brown hair. I could tell that he was starting to worry, too. We've got to find him, Mom said, gazing down to the street. He doesn't know this neighborhood at all. He probably wandered off and got lost. Mr. Dawes locked the front door and stepped down off the porch, pocketing the keys. He couldn't have gotten far, he said, giving Mom a reassuring smile. Let's drive around the block. I'm sure we'll find him. Mom shook her head and glanced nervously at Dad. I'll kill him, she muttered. Dad patted her on the shoulder. Mr. Dawes opened the trunk of the small Honda, pulled off his dark blazer, and tossed it inside. Then he took out a wide-brimmed, black cowboy hat and put it on his head. Hey that's quite a hat, Dad said, climbing into the front passenger seat. Keeps the sun away, Mr. Dawes said, sliding behind the wheel and slamming the car door. Mom and I got in back. Glancing over at her, I saw that Mom was as worried as I was. We headed down the block in silence, all four of us staring out the car windows. The houses we passed all seemed old. Most of them were even bigger than our house. All of them seemed to be in better condition, nicely painted with neat, well-trimmed lawns. I didn't see any people in the houses or yards, and there was no one on the street. It certainly is a quiet neighborhood, I thought. And shady. The houses all seemed to be surrounded by tall, leafy trees. The front yards we drove slowly past all seemed to be bathed in shade. The street was the only sunny place, a narrow gold ribbon that ran through the shadows on both sides. Maybe that's why it's called Dark Falls, I thought. Where is that son of mine? Dad asked, staring hard out the windshield. I'll kill him. I really will, Mom muttered. It wasn't the first time she had said that about Josh. We had gone around the block twice. No sign of him. Mr. Dawes suggested we drive around the next few blocks, and Dad quickly agreed. Hope I don't get lost. I'm new here, too, Mr. Dawes said, turning a corner. Hey, there's the school, he announced, pointing out the window at a tall redbrick building. It looked very old-fashioned, with white columns on both sides of the double front doors. Of course, it's closed now, Mr. Dawes added. My eyes searched the fenced-in playground behind the school. It was empty. No one there. Could Josh have walked this far? Mom asked, her voice tight and higher than usual. Josh doesn't walk, Dad said, rolling his eyes. He runs. We'll find him, Mr. Dawes said confidently, tapping his fingers on the wheel as he steered. We turned a corner onto another shady block. A street sign read Cemetery Drive, and sure enough, a large cemetery rose up in front of us. Granite gravestones rolled along a low hill, which sloped down and then up again onto a large flat stretch, also marked with rows of low grave markers and monuments. A few shrubs dotted the cemetery, but there weren't many trees. As we drove slowly past, the gravestones passing by in a blur on the left, I realized that this was the sunniest spot I had seen in the whole town. There's your son. Mr. Dawes, pointing out the window, stopped the car suddenly. Oh, thank goodness! Mom exclaimed, leaning down to see out the window on my side of the car. Sure enough, there was Josh, running wildly along a crooked row of low, white gravestones. What's he doing here? I asked, pushing open my car door. I stepped down from the car, took a few steps onto the grass, and called to him. At first, he didn't react to my shouts. He seemed to be ducking and dodging through the tombstones. He would run in one direction, then cut to the side, then head in another direction. Why was he doing that? I took another few steps and then stopped, gripped with fear. I suddenly realized why Josh was darting and ducking like that, running so wildly through the tombstones. He was being chased. Someone or something was after him.

Chapter 3

Then, as I took a few reluctant steps toward Josh, watching him bend low, then change directions, his arms outstretched as he ran, I realized I had a completely backward. Josh wasn't being chased. Josh was chasing. He was chasing after Percy. Okay, okay. So sometimes my imagination runs away with me. Running through an old graveyard like thieves in bright daylight is only natural that a person might start to have weird thoughts. I called to Josh again, and this time he heard me and turned around. He looked worried. Amadocome help me! he cried. Josh, what the matter? I ran as fast as I could to catch up with him, but he kept darting through the gravestones, moving from row to row. Help! Josh shouts wrong? I turned and saw that Mom and Dad were right behind me. In Percy, Josh explained, out of breath. I can get him to stop. I caught him once, but he pulled away from me. Percy? Percy? Dad started calling the dog. But Percy was moving from stone to stone, sniffing each one, then running to the next. How did you get all the way over here? Dad asked as he caught up with my brother. I had to follow Percy. Josh explained, still looking very worried. He just took off. One second he was sniffing around that dead flower bed in our front yard. The next second he just started to run. He wouldn't stop when I called. Wouldn't even look back. He kept running till he got here. I had to follow. I was afraid he'd get lost. Josh stopped and gratefully let Dad take over the chase. I don't know what that dumb dog problem is, he said to me. He's just weird. It took Dad a few tries, but he finally managed to grab Percy and pick him up off the ground. Our little terrier gave a halfhearted yelp of protest, then allowed himself to be carried away. We all trooped back to the car on the side of the road. Mr. Daves was waiting by the car. Maybe you'd better get a leash for that dog, he said, looking very concerned. Percy's never been on a leash. Josh protested, worriedly climbing into the backseat. Well, we might have to try one for a while. Dad said quietly. Especially if he keeps running away. Dad tossed Percy into the backseat. The dog eagerly curled up in Josh's arms. The rest of us piled into the car, and Mr. Daves drove us back to his office, a tiny, white, flat-roofed building at the end of a row of small offices. As we rode, I reached over and smacked the back of Percy's head. Why did the dog run away like that? I wondered. Percy had never done that before. I guessed that Percy was also upset about our moving. After all, Percy had spent his whole life in our old house. He probably felt a lot like Josh and I did about having to pack up and move and never see the old neighborhood again. The new house, the new streets, and all the new smells must have freaked the poor dog out. Josh wanted to run away from the whole idea. And so did Percy. Anyway, that was my theory. Mr. Daves parked the car in front of his tiny office, shook Dad's hand, and gave him a business card. You can come by next week, he told Mom and Dad. I'll have all the legal work done by then. After you sign the papers, you can move in anytime. He pushed open the car door and, giving us all a final smile, prepared to climb out. Compton Daves, Mom said, reading the white business card over Dad's shoulder. That's an unusual name. Is Compton an old family name? Mr. Daves shook his head. No, he said. In the only Compton in my family. I have no idea where the name comes from. No idea at all. Maybe my parents didn't know how to spell Charlie? Chuckling at his terrible joke, he climbed out of the car, lowered the wide black Seltzer hat on his head, pulled his blazer from the trunk, and disappeared into the small white building. Dad climbed behind the wheel, moving the seat back to make room for his big stomach. Mom got up front, and we started the long drive home. I guess you and Percy had quite an adventure today. Mom said to Josh, rolling up her window because Dad had turned on the car conditioner. I guess, Josh said without enthusiasm. Percy was sound asleep in his lap, snoring quietly. You're going to love your room, I told Josh. The whole house is great. Really. Josh stared at me thoughtfully, but didn't answer. I poked him in the ribs with my elbow. Say something. Did you hear what I said? But the weird, thoughtful look didn't fade from Josh's face. The next couple of weeks seemed to crawl by. I walked around the house thinking about how I'd never see my room again. How I'd never eat breakfast in this kitchen again, how I'd never watch TV in the living room again. Morbid stuff like that. I had this sick feeling when the movers came one afternoon and delivered a tall stack of cartons. Time to pack up. It was really happening. Even though it was the middle of the afternoon, I went up to my room and flopped down on my bed. I didn't nap or anything. I just stared at the ceiling for more than an hour, and all these wild, unconnected thoughts ran through my head, like a dream. Only I was awake. I want the only one who was nervous about the move. Mom and Dad were snoring at each other over nothing at all. One morning they had a big fight over whether the bacon was too crispy or not. In a way, it was funny to see them being so childish. Josh was acting really sulky all the time. He hardly spoke a word to anyone. And Percy walked, too. That dumb dog wouldn't even pick himself up and come over to me when I had some table scraps for him. I guess the hardest part about moving was saying good-bye to my friends. Carol and Andy were away at camp, so I had to write to them. But Kathy was home, and she was my oldest and best friend, and the hardest to say good-bye to. I think some people were surprised that Kathy and I had moved such good friends. For one thing, we look so different. I'm tall and thin and dark, and she's fair-skinned, with long blonde hair, and a little chubby. But we've been friends since preschool, and best friends since fourth grade. When she came over the night before the move, we were both terribly awkward. Kathy, you shouldn't be nervous, I told her. You're not the one who's moving away forever. It's not like you're moving to China or something, she answered, chewing hard on her bubble gum. Dad falls in only four hours away. Amadoc. Well, see each other a lot. Yeah, I guess, I said. But I didn't believe it. Four hours away was as bad as being in China, as far as I was concerned. I guess we can still talk on the phone, I said glumly. She blew a small green bubble, then sucked it back into her mouth. Yeah. Sure, she said, pretending to be enthusiastic. You're lucky, you know. Moving out of this crummy neighborhood to a big house. It's not a crummy neighborhood, I insisted. I don't know why I was defending the neighborhood. I never had before. One of our favorite pastimes was thinking of places we'd rather be growing up. School won't be the same without you, she sighed, curling her legs under her on the chair. Who's going to slip me the answers in math? I laughed. I always slipped you the wrong answers. But it was the thought that counted, Kathy said. And then she groaned. Ugh. Junior high. Is your new junior high part of the high school or part of the elementary school? I made a disgusted face. Everything is one building. It's a small town, remember? There's no separate high school. At least, I didn't see one. Bummer, she said. Bummer was right. We chatted for hours. Until Kathy's mom called and said it was time for her to come home. Then we hugged. I had made up my mind that I wouldn't cry, but I could feel the big, hot tears forming in the corners of my eyes. And then there were running down my cheeks. I'm so miserable! I wailed. I had planned to be really controlled and mature. But Kathy was my best friend, after all, and what could I do? We made a promise that we'd always be together on our birthday into matter what. We'd force our parents to make sure we didn't miss each other's birthdays. And then we hugged again. And Kathy said, Don't worry. We'll see each other a lot. Really. And she had tears in her eyes, too. She turned and ran out the door. The screen door clattered hard behind her. I stood there staring out into the darkness until Percy came scampering in, his toenails clicking across the linoleum, and started to lick my hand. The next morning, moving day, was a rainy Saturday. Not a drop of rain. No thunder or lightning. But just enough rain and wind to make the long drive slow and unpleasant. The sky seemed to get darker as we entered the new neighborhood. The heavy trees bent low over the street. Slow down, Jack. Mom warned shrilly. The street is really slick. But Dad was in a hurry to get to the house before the moving van did. They'd just put the stuff anywhere if we were not there to supervise, he explained. Josh, beside me in the backseat, was being a real pain, as usual. He kept complaining that he was thirsty. When that didn't get results, he started whining that he was starving. But we had all had a big breakfast, so that didn't get any reaction, either. He just wanted attention, of course. I kept trying to cheer him up by telling him how great the house was inside and how big his room was. He still hadn't seen it. But he didn't want to be cheered up. He started wrestling with Percy, getting the poor dog all worked up, until Dad had to shout at him to stop. Let's all try really hard not to get on each other's nerves, Mom suggested. Dad laughed. Good idea, dear. Don't make fun of me, she snapped. They started to argue about who was more exhausted from all the packing. Percy stood up on his hind legs and started to howl at the back window. Can't you shut him up? Mom screamed. I pulled Percy down, but he struggled back up and started howling again. His never does this before, I said. Just get him quiet! Mom insisted. I pulled Percy down by his hind legs, and Josh started to howl. Mom turned around and gave him a dirty look. Josh didn't stop howling, though. He thought he was a riot. Finally, Dad pulled the car up the driveway of the new house. The tires crunched over the wet gravel. Rain pounded on the roof. Home sweet home, Mom said. I couldn't tell if she was being sarcastic or not. I think she was really glad the long car ride was over. At least we beat the movers. Dad said, glancing at his watch. Then his expression changed. Hope they're not lost. It's as dark as night out there, Josh complained. Percy was jumping up and down in my lap, desperate to get out of the car. He was usually a good traveler. But once the car stopped, he wanted out immediately. I opened my car door and he leaped onto the driveway with a yelp and started to run in a wild zigzag across the front yard. At least someone's glad to be here, Josh said quietly. Dad ran up to the porch and, fumbling with the unfamiliar keys, managed to get the front door open. Then he motioned for us to come into the house. Mom and Josh ran across the walk, eager to get in out of the rain. I closed the car door behind me and started to jog after them. But something caught my eye. I stopped and looked up to the twin bay windows above the porch. I held a hand over my eyebrows to shield my eyes and squinted through the rain. Yes. I saw it. A face. In the window on the left. The boy. The same boy was up there, staring down at me.